The computers of decades ago could run numerical models of the weather no more than three days ahead before their predictions became a pure fiction. Today better data, more detailed atmospheric models and immensely faster computers have pushed the range of reliable forecasts to nearly six days on average.

Though better predictions are saving many lives and a lot of money, each extension in range of prediction comes at a higher price. For the weather is intrinsically chaotic, so that a tiny inaccuracy in the initial data can easily snowball into a huge error which renders long-term prediction hopeless.

- ① Computers have increased our near-term predictive power for weather.
- ② It is believed that weather can be predicted with precision very soon.
- ③ Computers have made long-term weather forecasting a pure fiction.
- 4 It is highly unlikely that a small change in weather data causes a sizable difference in prediction.
